PTARMIGAN VALLEY TWENTY YEARS AGO

by MARY SHAEFFER WARREN

It is a beautiful valley, a valley to take the fancy of either trumper or trail rider. It lies just north of Louise Station, and to look in its direction, no one would ever suspect the attractions lying behind the low and somewhat prosy hills.

I was under the impression that I knew every crack and cranny about Louise, every spot in which to find a rare plant, every place to which a woman could walk at least ten miles or ride fifty. One day I heard by merest accident that Walter Dwight Wilcox of Washington, D.C., had rambled into a valley of which none of us had heard. To him it was probably only a pleasant walk and I think he returned at nightfall.

I confided his alluring and interesting descriptions to a willing listener, who suggested that he, his wife and I make a reconnaissance just to see if Mr. Wilcox was right.

It was a most perfect morning that we set forth to have a general look at things. We crossed at the station and headed for a mountain at that time known as Mt. O'Bryan. This mountain is anything but an imposing affair. But that suited us perfectly. We were not using our own legs but those of three stout and willing cayuses and the easier the better for us.

My own steed was one—Eva. She was as white as her maternal parent Dinah was black. Eva had inherited her mother's finest quality—a surefootedness that was unbeatable.

Every horse I knew in those days had at some time come from Indian stock, which simply means they are the most reliable little things in the form of horse flesh that can be obtained for uncertain trailing. We zigzagged up the rather low mountain mentioned above. Obstructions were few and very easily navigated. In fact Eva understood her job so well that I sat astride her without much thought of where she chose to set her sure little feet.

To say the least, the ascent was almost as easy as though we had kept to level ground, and at the top of the mountain we had a wonderful view into the new valley. It looked positively thrilling—just because the whole venture was new to us. The alpine flowers lay all about our ponies' feet, but after my long hunt of years to gather in the alpine flora, preserve and classify them, there was nothing particularly exciting about them.

I knew quite a lot more about the flowers than I did of my new friend Eva—or any other horse for that matter at the time. I have my suspicions that the man accompanying us needed a few lessons himself, as result proved. Eva was a grass-fed lady and naturally a long and arduous climb had used up her previous supply. Her cincha should have been investigated before we turned for the down-grade, but I knew nothing at the time of such matters, and no one else seemed to have any personal interest in the anatomy of my pony. Eva had plainly shrunk alarmingly from the exercise.

We started down in due course, following a gully here and there, or an open bit of alpine meadow. Suddenly my ignorant mind took in the fact that trouble of some sort was brewing, and I got far enough to say: "Mr. B., don't you think I am getting quite too near Eva's ears?" There was no time to turn my steed upward—accidents always occur that way—and without another breath, I found myself sprawled like a frog on the ground, right in front of my mount. I looked round and beheld an expression of the utmost horror on the faces of my companions, while Eva was actually squatting on all fours with the red saddle-blanket over her head. Not being at all hurt, the whole thing showed itself as utterly ridiculous and I burst out laughing. Our one man leaped from his saddle and we found my left spur completely caught in the stirrup. It took him almost five minutes to release me. Eva never budged and I could not.

Such was my first introduction to our beautiful valley. Our escort of that day went off the next alone, to explore for himself what we had seen, and returned to say he had named the valley "Ptarmigan" owing to the vast flocks of that variety of birds he had seen. What he had to report was enough to whet appetites always on the alert for something new, and in three days six of us were up and off with "grub" enough to last us four or five days.

Leaving Louise Station we had to ford the Pipestone River. It is not so much as a river as the fact that the river bed is a mass of huge boulders over which the best of trail ponies might slip and fall in the swirling little torrent. To-day there is an excellent bridge, but at that time we loved the excitement of navigating the small, treacherous waters—the love of something out of the ordinary. Not so very far from the ford we started a slight incline of the hillside and were astonished at being attacked by two young eagles. We never found any reason why six harmless explorers (?) should be swooped upon in that rude manner, but waved our arms and whooped to the best of our ability, defending our own eyes and those of our horses till the birds of their own volition decided to cease their annoyance, which was not at all comfortable.

The ascent to the valley was wholly alpine, very gradual, with open stretches of flowers waist-high and the unknown mountains stretching away in varied colors of blue and purple as Canadian mountains have a habit of doing. As it was about 1905 when this particular trip occurred, it is a little hard, with no recorded detail, to give particular facts, but it remains in my mind what an easy trip it was, what a flower-bestrewn trail we made for ourselves and that surroundings grew constantly more interesting.

We saw no Indian trails, we just seemed to follow our own noses and get somewhere, somehow, without any difficulty.

With us was a child of about eight years, quite trained to the saddle and mounted on a safe and stodgy old pony. She wore golden curls partly concealed by a gay pink sun-bonnet, so that we could not leave her very far from sight if we had wished. If all trailers were like that child, trailing would be the easiest of accomplishments. She was so completely philosophic and always bent her will to whatever came along, all, I might say, except in one instance. We found her lagging behind in the upland meadows, and when we returned for her, the tears were falling from her brave blue eyes. It was a matter of sheer temper, for her mount, having located the finest grass he had seen in many a day, was feeding peacefully, while the child was hauling with all her might on the reins but utterly incapacitated by her size and strength. Having a nice leather quirt with me, I surprised him back to his duty with one good stroke and thus ended our wee trailer's trouble.

Our camp that night was a very wonderful one to a botanist—with flowers, flowers everywhere about us and above us the sweet-smelling Lyall's larch. This is not a common tree, speaking generally, but very profuse in the mountains about Louise.

In the fall of 1895 a Philadelphia photographer had visited Louise and its environs and made some fine photographs. Some of these came to the attention of Prof. Sargeant, the well-known botanist of trees specially. Prof. Sargeant noted a curious band of color at about 8,000 feet in all these pictures. He was of the opinion that it was made by the yellowing of the leaves of this particular larch and went personally the following year to see if he had solved that problem. He was correct in his diagnosis. This larch is found at about tree-line, or 6 000 to 8,000 feet above the sea. The needle-like leaves turn golden in the fall, drop to the ground, and appear the following spring, the most perfect green that Nature can give them. Crimson bracts appear, very sweet in odor, and the bees and butterflies find the honey therefrom about their first real feast after a long winter.

One tiny lake among the many small lakes of that upper valley stands out prominently in memory. After a well-earned rest our first night out, we had the perfect breakfast, and then mounting our ponies, went strolling hither and yon, beholding what might be at hand. Ascending a rather low knoll, we were all particularly impressed with a very small lake, perfect in coloring and lying at the base of a wonderful glacier which seemed from our point to be standing on end. At the water's edge nearest us, rose one little pine tree, and our sentimentalist said: "I think we might call it Lone Tree Lake." Since then surveyors have passed through our sanctuary, and though the little pine may still be guarding the lovely glacier and lake, it doubtless has some other name, for we never left any record of our find. We sprinkled names around galore on the many lakes we saw, we saw ptarmigan in profusion, but perhaps they are gone as well as the names of the first campers into the valley.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF HIS ANCESTORS

Duke Dmitri of Leuchtenberg who has travelled from Europe in the hope of being at the Pow-Wow in Ptarmigan Valley, August 1st.

The Pow-Wow promises to be truly an international gathering. Among those present the one who will probably hold the record of having made the longest journey will be Duke Dmitri of Leuchtenberg, who has come all the way from Bavaria so as to be present.

Duke Dmitri is a direct descendant of Charles, Marquis de Beauharnois, who was Governor of New France between 1726 and 1747. Incidentally he is related to most of the crowned heads of Europe and is a great-grandson of Czar Nicholas I of Russia. Interviewed in Montreal, he stated that this was his first visit to Canada, with which he is so closely connected historically. "There is," he said, "in the possession of my family, a document printed on birchbark and written in French and Iroquois, addressed to the Marquis de Beauharnois, thanking the Governor for 'his kindly care of his children,' the Iroquois." He added that he was following to some extent in the footsteps of the great adventurers and explorers encouraged by his ancestor, one of whom, La Verendrye, had founded Fort William and even penetrated farther west. It would, he said, be interesting to visit for the first time a city that had such intimate associations for him through his ancestor. For this reason he had been anxious to see the country.

Born in St. Petersburg, the duke was too young to take part in the world war, but he participated in the two year campaign against Bolshevism conducted by General Denekine and Baron Wrangel. At one time their forces had been within a few miles of Moscow, but eventually lack of men and supplies had driven them back. He escaped from the country and had been staying since in various parts of Europe.
